A couple from Syracuse, New York, are dealing with quite a bit of embarrassment. They were physically joined as they entered into a hospital's emergency room on Saturday. The couple was stuck together after having mistaken industrial super glue for a sexual lubricant – commonly referred to as lube. In other words, they were stuck together in an explicit sexual position when they were admitted into the hospital for treatment and care, according to News Watch 28 on Monday.

The couple, 36-year-old Martha Weizman and 41-year-old Matthew Caleda, called emergency services after it was apparent they had erred and caused quite a problem for themselves. They were immediately taken to St. Joseph's Hospital Health Center. Paramedics reportedly did their best to cover the couple with blankets, according to a RoastRoom.com report on the unusual story. However, the couple was said to have drawn the attention of other persons in the emergency room area as they were brought into the hospital's emergency room entrance. After all, they were naked and stuck together via both of their genital areas.

An 83-year-old patient who witnessed the horrendous episode said, "This is absolutely disgusting. They're nothing but a bunch of perverted exhibitionists. Everyone was taking pictures of them." Whether it was disgusting or not, a surgery – described as extremely delicate and complex – lasted more than three hours. They were able to walk out of their own accord after the procedure. They only suffered minor injuries.

Caleda told the responding paramedics that, in the rush of things - commonly referred to as 'the heat of the moment' - he accidentally took the tube of super glue instead of his lube tube as the two containers have similar shapes, says DawgTalkers. He and his partner refused to talk to reporters when leaving the hospital. Quite incredibly, it is reported that this sort of thing has happened 26 other times in the past two years. Of improvement, however, it is only the second incident in 2015.
